Auburn, Feb. 28, 1860.

REPORT OF THE SUPERINTENDING SCHOOL COMMITTEE.

CITIZENS OF AUBURN :

Your School Committee have attended to their duty according to their oath of office and the requirements of the statutes, and would make the following report.

Your Committee, at their organization in May, feeling the necessity of securing teachers of higher rank than have, in some former years, been employed in town, voted not to approve any candidate under eighteen years of age, and that no more than one half of the number employed, should be beginners in teaching.

In our efforts to elevate the rank of our teachers, we have in a good degree been successful, so that during the year past, the scholars as a whole have had teachers of more than the average talent in former years. True, some persons have been employed, who ought never to teach school, and thus it will be in the future till the people in the several districts are awake to the importance of securing suitable persons for Prudential Committees, and cease electing such individuals as they would not trust to select them a pig, or drive their horse to mill, simply because the person belongs to this or that party, or worse still, to have a little fun at the school meeting. The interest involved—the good of your children, is something of more serious, vital importance than to be thus lightly disposed of.

Again, we must call the attention of Prudential Committees and Selectmen to the fact, that no teacher is entitled to compensation till the Register is PROPERLY filled out. It would be well for the Selectmen not to pay over the school-money to the Prudential Committees until requested to do so by the Superintending School Committee.

The number of weeks taught in each district, and by whom, with other interesting statistics may be found in the tabular report.

The progress of the scholars in the various branches taught in the schools, has been as great as could reasonably be expected, when taking into consideration the shortness of the terms.

The amount of school-money raised, is altogether insufficient for the accomplishment of the object for which our schools are designed. Owing to a sparse population, our schools are necessarily small, and the terms consequently must be very short, and taught by inferior teachers at that, unless there is a very much more liberal expenditure of money. Good teachers cannot be obtained, even if the committees are willing to pay them what they ask per month or week, unless there is sufficient money to be expended to employ them more than six or eight weeks.

Auburn has sent forth to the world a goodly number of men who have taken a prominent place among the educators, the scientific and literary men of the day. Shall it be said the efforts have exhausted you fellow citizens? Or will you not rather be stimulated by past success to put forth still greater efforts, that you may thus retain the fame already acquired?

We do not design to speak of the particular merits or de-merits of the several teachers separately. If parents have visited the schools as they should, they are well acquainted with the points of excellence or the lack of them, which their respective teachers possessed, and if they have not thus become acquainted with the teachers the fault is theirs, and we desire that they may so feel it, that in the future they may be led to seek that knowledge of those who may teach their children, which shall be a benefit both to them and the pupils, and shall encourage the teachers.

The parent often asks, in considering a case of discipline, "was it for the good of my child?" The teacher asks is it for the good of the school?" The teacher's criterion in such a case is the true one.

Whether for the good of society or not, it certainly will not be said to be for the good of an individual that he should be hanged.

The school is a little community for the good of the whole, of which the teacher must act. If parents will visit the school-room, they will soon see the correctness of the teacher's course, and their own lack of knowledge on many points, where they may have supposed the teacher wrong.

Let home education and that of the school go hand in hand. Let the one prepare the way for the more complete success of the other. Let more attention be given to the one and there will be greater prosperity in the others.

The teacher cannot always make his pupils what they should be ; but the family training and school discipline be sufficiently strict, and much may be done to develop our youth aright, both intellectually and morally.

The moral relations of the teacher to the school are intimate and responsible. If he be not expected to teach the science of ethics, he is to exert a refined, high toned moral influence over the school.— And though the teacher should direct the scholar in the path of right and duty, and by precept and example impress upon his heart, his moral obligations to his race, his parents, himself and to God, we are constrained to believe that the results of such labor are not always commensurate with the object. We are not however to expect too much in this respect, and let not the teacher be, “weary in well-doing.” The school is but one department of education, intellectual or moral.

Yet to education as afforded in our public schools and imparted in the family in training of the child to the great and important duties of life ; in the cultivation of the disposition, the natural inclinations, tastes, feelings and desires which, developing, form the character of the man ; in the leading forth and calling out the latent powers of the mind ; the awakening to activity, the kindling of the intellectual fire ; in the culture of the moral and religious nature, warming into action the affections, and the finer and holier feelings of the heart ; in the inculcating of the love of truth, justice, right—to such education are we to look for the production of scholars whose youth shall be as a fountain of purity and beauty, and whose manhood as its crystalization into true, manly, christian character.

Then if you would have good schools, let means adequate to the object be employed. There are many things which go to make up the good school. Expect not real true success in your schools without the aid of faithful and competent teachers ; and not then unless they have the support and co-operation of parents. And not only this but parents must prepare their children for good scholars in the proper discipline of them at home. This done, and there need be few unruly scholars, and less poor schools.
